Human Rights Groups Call for Immediate Action on Local Human Rights Legislation
Cite Pervasive Inequality in City Employment and Services.

Leading NYC human rights organizations came together on the steps of City Hall this afternoon to demand action on Int. 512-A, the Human Rights in Government Operations Audit Law (Human Rights GOAL). Citing overwhelming evidence of widespread inequality in New York City, the group demanded that the city's leadership stand up and address the problem with meaningful long-term solutions that move past election season politicking. Int. 512-A proposes changes to the way the City of New York currently handles discrimination and other human and civil rights issues. The bill would move the city from a passive system that responds to individual complaints of discrimination to a comprehensive and proactive system that involves partnerships between city agencies and community advocates. If passed, the legislation would require city agencies to conduct periodic reviews of their programs and policies, using data and community input, to ensure that they do not have the effect of being discriminatory. Thirty-two council members have signed on as sponsors of the bill.

"As we learned from Hurricane Katrina's vastly disproportionate impact on communities whose needs were long ignored by all levels of government, elected officials and policymakers must consider how policies and programs affect all segments of the population," said Cindy Soohoo from Columbia University's Human Rights Institute. "This is especially true in New York City, where poverty rates and income disparities are among the greatest in the nation."

Participants at the press conference all demanded action to remedy pervasive inequality in the City including the underemployment of black youth, the glass ceiling in city managerial positions, voter disenfranchisement in the Asian community, limited access to affordable housing in Latino communities, racial and income disparities in health care, police misconduct against sexual minorities, pervasive residential segregation, under investment in low-income and immigrant communities, limited access to transportation and buildings for people with disabilities, and inadequate measures to address hate crimes, racial profiling, and sexual harassment.

"You've heard today about the scope and devastating impact of systemic discrimination in the city, and the inadequacy of the city's approach to addressing these problems," said Council Member Bill Perkins who first introduced the legislation. "This is why we are calling for immediate action on Int. 512-A which gives city leaders a bold new tool for tackling deep rooted problems."

Int. 512-A has the support of former Mayor David Dinkins who at the first hearing on the bill urged that the City take steps to safeguard the rights of the people of our City rather than seek remedies once the damage is done. Other individual supporters include C. Virginia Fields, Rep. Jerry Nadler, Rep. Major Owens, Ronnie Eldridge, Ruth Messinger, Catherine Abate, Jerry Lopez, and Rev. Dr. James Forbes, Jr.

The legislation was developed by the NYC Human Rights Initiative (NYCHRI), a citywide coalition of over 80 community-based organizations, service-providers, advocacy groups, policymakers, and labor unions, as well as individual clergy, elected officials and educators.
